Book Details Share

After the unexpected deaths of her parents, young academic Mira returns to her childhood home in Athens. On her first night back, she encounters a new neighbor, a longtime ship captain who has found himself, for the first time in years, no longer at sea. As one summer night tumbles into another, Mira and the Captain's voices drift across the balconies of their apartments, disclosing details and stories: of careers, of families, of love. For Mira, love has so often meant Aris, an ex-boyfriend and rising Greek politician who has recently become engaged to a movie star. There is, too, her love for her dear friend Nefeli—a well-known queer artist who came of age during the military dictatorship—as well as Dimitra and Fady, a couple caring for a young refugee boy. Undergirding each relationship is the love that these characters have for Athens, a beautiful but complicated city that is equal parts lushness and sharp edges. Scorpionfish is a map of how—and where—we find our true selves: in the pull of the sea, the sway of late-night bar music, the risk and promise of art, and—perhaps most of all—in the sp... Mira returns to Athens after the death of her parents. She has long semi-anonymous conversations with the sea captain next door as they navigate loss, family, art, politics, and more. It made me think of Rachel Cusk a bit in theme but not writing style. It's a bit mundane really, but I enjoyed sinking deeply into the daily lives of the characters. I had a copy from the publisher, this comes out July 7.

This book was my companion at the outbreak of COVID-19 and I could not have wished for a better friend. The grieving narrator is uprooted and lost, spending her time napping, drinking a little too much, and cleaning up her dead parents' apartment all the while kindling a romance with a mysterious neighbor via a shared balcony. It's haunting and precise. I loved it.

Rating: ★★★ Thank you to Tin House Books for the Advanced Copy received through NetGalley. I really am unsure of how to even write a review for this. And that's not because I disliked it, but because I'm not sure if I liked it... It was an interesting story, but the plot was so all over the place it seemed like there were mini-plots that seemingly existed even though there was no grand plot. It was also like the story was being told from the present, but also from the future? Like the narrators (Mira and The Captain) would be in the present living a moment... more
